D&D Backstory

Name: IRC - 10414, “Wanderer”

Warforged Twilight Domain Cleric (devotee of Selyra)

Backstory:

They were created as an expendable worker for excavating dangerous tombs / hazardous salvage.

During one job, they were caught in some kind of magical accident which resulted in them being sent to the astral plane.

While there, they had an encounter with what they believe to be the goddess Selyra, and upon returning dedicated themselves to her worship and to spreading her gospel.

At the start of the campaign, they’ve been traveling fruitlessly from small town to smaller towns along the coast, and have decided to try their luck in the big city.

Personality and traits:

Plucky and dedicated, always looking for an opportunity to help. Overtly ‘spiritual’ - seeking some sort of ascendence but not sure how to express or reach it

Twilight domain, associated with the goddess of dreams and prophecy, so perhaps while they “sleep” they have visions or dreams that they can interpret as signs from Selyra (a robot that dreams)

Changed profoundly by the accident, so quite different from other warforged - sort of ‘defective,’ only recently truly sentient. (Perhaps the company they were built for is looking to find them and fix whatever has gone ‘wrong?’)

Player primer questions:

What does your character believe the Silence meant?

Abandonment, loss. Like an orphan who just found out that they could have had parents.

Who in Port Meridian would miss you if you didn’t come back from below?

Perhaps they’ve been staying with some Myrraenic priests at a parish (?) in the city.

What is one thing you will not do for coin - and what would it cost to change your mind?

Probably murder I would think. They're still getting to grips with their own alive-ness, god forbid taking away someone else's.
I'm not sure any amount of coin would change their mind, but perhaps if they felt that their goddess was commanding them to, or some motivation of that sort they might bend.

Appearance:

Quite slightly built for a warforged, made of finely worked but sturdy brass, with the lacquer in some places starting to wear. They've engraved patterns of star constellations all over their body. (think tattoos)

Gaslamp pupils, purple and flickering. In front of them, various lenses which adjust according to whatever they're looking at. Other than that, they don't have a whole lot of face going on, besides the general shape of a head, and the suggestion of a mouth. The overall impression you get is of curiosity. (think C-3PO)

They're dressed in lovingly homemade deep purple vestments, which almost cover the armour built into their chassis.

Slung over their shoulder is a worn backpack, with a shield (also self decorated) and an extremely cheap looking warhammer strapped to it.

If the room is quiet enough, and you listen hard enough, you can make out the sound of the various clockwork circuits inside them. Unlike lots of automatons, however, their circuits don't beat entirely regularly: some sound like they move faster than others, some slower, and some sound like they're moving in and out of sync with each other.